Miss Helen Menken and Conway Tearle in "The Mad Dog."

Conway Tearle Restored to the Speaking Stage With Miss Menken His Leading Feminine Associate.

The Shuberts selected a play by George | the most philosophical caim in all the carborough called "The Mad Dog" as the means of restoring Conway Tearie to the speaking stage and last night he and the play were visible on the stage of the Comody Theatre. Mr Scarbor-ough is an adapt in fashioning scenes of or the Comedy Theatre. Mr Scarborough is an adspt in fashioning scenes of tense emotional or maybe, physical force.

He naturally built the new play about one of them.

The mad dog—he had been made mad by a cruel deception in earlier days and the punishment that followed—found a pretty girl in the home of a padre. The scene was on the Mexican border and maybe the padre was inevitable. At all events he was there with a girl that so upset the desperate and lawiess man accustomed to take what he wanted, that he helped himself quite shamelessly, and

The East-West Players are presenting the sweek under the direction of Gustav Blum at the Princess Theatre, four one act plays of international favor in furtherance of their plan of his father's murder is planned, which his father's murder is planned, which added all the more to the effectiveness of the highly emotional scenes. These and his rendition of the play's famed sollogules brought curtain calls. Mr. Sothern's interpretation of the Prince of Denmark gave buoyant virility to the passages wherein retribution for his father's murder is planned, which added all the more to the effectiveness of the highly emotional scenes. These and his rendition of the play's famed solidoutes brought curtain calls. Miss Marlowe as Ophelia was especially effective in the scene where grief and unreturned love drive her insane. In this she was superb.

Surrounding the stars was a competent cast which, in intonation echoed the diction of the principals. Mr. Sothern, perhaps, told theem literally to speak the speeches as he pronounced them to them. One exception was Sydney Mather, who returned to the role of Learters after appearing in modern plays with Miss Margaret Anglin, and who, apparently, has not yet got back to the habit of speaking blank verse in the manner of the others. And another was Rowland Buckatone, as the joily grave digreer who refuses to take tragedy seriously.

Miss Joan Clement Joined the cast associated with Mr. Sothern and Miss Marglow last night. She is a daughter of lowe last night. She is a daughter of the passages wherein retribution for the principals. The star play that passes with a fair smount of interest in an inn of a mountain hamlet in Rumania. The place was translated by Simeon H. Klafter.

The other playlets included "Autumn Frieg." a rather bitterly ironic comedy in an old men's home translated by Benjamin F. Glazer from the Danish of Gustave Wied: "Sweet and Twenty." a comedy of Lons Island real estate by Floyd Dell, and "The Pot Boiler." a satire on a stage rehearsal by Alice Gerstenberg.

The full value of these plays is marred by acting that is generally amateurish. Blum participated in three of the quarters, and managed to lend some histriously.

Miss Joan Clement joined the cast associated with Mr. Sothern and Miss Marlowe last night. She is a daughter of the late Edward H. Clement, who for more than thirty years was editor of the Boston Transcript, and Mrs. Clement, with whom she lives at 57 West Fiftyelighth street.

Persians, but amsteurs now have an opportunity in the Anderson Galieries to compare the designs of our imaginative artists with the actual garments of the Haroun al Raschids and Fatimas of legend. A collection assembled by Alaister McKelvie of London, England, has in it much of novelty and interest. The chief item is a royal embroidered tent, the like of which has not been seen here previously. It is said to have been made during the reign of Fath Ali Shah in the eighteenth century and is a worman in the contract of the court of th been made during the reign of Fath All Shah in the eighteenth century and is a mass of embroidery and applique work. The tent is large, house shaped, with a slanting roof. Inside and out it is richly decorated, the spaces being broken up into panels which alternate figure compositions with floral devices. Two panels of pierced embroidery serve as windows. The interior is now fitted with rugs, cushions, lights and a Koran so that a practising Persian who had the means might take possession at once.

Horatio and Miss Hamlet. Horatio discovers at Miss Hamlet: death that he's holding a woman in his arms, which seems to make her going doubly poignant for him, and iends a new interpretation to the famous line, "There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, &c."

Miss Nielsen displays feeling and artistry in the role, but the general impression was that one would prefer Shakespeare undiluted by the movies. After all, he's managed to struggle along for three centuries pretty well witmout so that a practising Persian who had the means might take possession at once.

There are silk rugs made after ancient models, Persian falence and bronze work, Near Eastern weapons, indian and Persian shawls, jewelry and furs and a long series of gay vestments for both mondaine and ecclesiastical uses. Many of these cloaks and jackets are heavily embroidered in gold and silver in a way that seems daring to Western eyes. There are also many wall hangings in applique that are charming in color and design, and there is included one notable piece of French craftsmanthip—a fine Aubusson carpet. The sale takes place on Friday and Saturday.

Shakespeare undiffered by the movies. After all, he's managed to struggle along for three centuries pretty well without their assistance.

The settings, said to have been made amid the pictures showing the forbidding interior of the castle and its sweeping halls, with men at arms moving about in processions, held attention, especially as all of them appeared to have this guarantee. But the story was not particularly strong in dramatic appeal, and in these days when the women are getting everything they might want, it would seem that the men at least could keep Hamles. Many of these cloaks and jackets are heavily embroidered in gold and sliver in a way that seems daring to Western eyes. There are also many wall hangings in applique that are charming in color and design, and there is included one notable plece of French craftsman-ship—a fine Aubusson carpet. DR.LE GRAND DANFORTH

Shakespeare has been turned loose on the screen at the Lexington Theatre this week with a Scandinavian twist in "Hamilet," wherein it appears that the bard's story has been transformed into a sort of fealth pastry. This celluloid felleacy, presented by Asta Flims, Inc. has been given whipped cream sweeting by making the Prince of Denmark in reality a woman, which may explain to many persons his various changes of mind.

Apparently this was done to give Miss Asta Nielsen, Danish tragedlenne, who is the mainstay of the film company, a chance to play the role without having some captious critic groan, "Another emancipated Hamilet?" The audience and the Queen of Denmark know the Prince's secret, but the rest of the court does not appear to suspect—perhaps if they had been brought up on a steady diet of movies it would have been easy for them. In this way scope is given
